I don't know Dirk Wittenborn, and I haven't read any of his other books, but the wit and style of his writing in this book makes me eager to read more. I don't know Jazz Johnson well, but I know her well enough to greet her and chat briefly at cocktail parties or at hunt "teas" after a morning of fox-hunting. She's one of the finest amateur riders in the country (see her ride on YouTube). She's a Master of the Essex Fox Hounds, which celebrated the 100th anniversary of its founding last fall, and it's a delight to watch her lead the first flight over coops and fences and walls. She's a hard-headed business woman who raises and sells heirloom turkeys, tries to run a farm in the black, raises and trains horses, designs and sells jewelry. In a designer gown at a ball, she looks gorgeous and completely in control. She comes from "old money" (her great-grandfather founded Johnson & Johnson), but she drives her kids to school in a minivan. Her brother made a famous documentary called "Born Rich" that made him Persona Non Grata in some circles (and this book may do the same for her). She's serious and responsible, hard-working and under pressure, yet approachable, beautiful, and fun. She doesn't boast or show off or put down people who are less advantaged. I mention these things about Ms. Johnson to show that she is a complex person, not a caricature. She and her Uncle Dirk have set themselves a difficult task that is similarly complex. There are wanna-be "Society" authors who would use a title like "The Social Climber's Bible" as a serious guide to sneaking up the social class ladder. (I know a man in his fifties who spent $70,000 in The Hamptons two summers ago trying to entice an heiress who would pay his bills, but all he got was drunk.) Ms.
