I received this book today and the author makes it seem so easy. My husband and I were skeptical about this, but ordered the book anyway, with our hopes staying in check. I mean, if it's such a wonderful program, why wasn't everyone doing it? I called the Bureau of Land Management, who operates this program, and the following comes from them: 1. It is not buying the land, it is filing a mining claim. You merely rent the right to mine the land for minerals deemed valuable by the government. There are fees associated with this. Also, you must pay an additional $100 a year to keep the claim, whether you mine or not. What do they deem valuable minerals? Those that serve the Govt. or the military. i.e.: Gold, Platinum, Silver, Palladium, etc. 2. You are not able to build a house on the land. You CAN build structures and make improvements to support your mining operation, but a house? You might be able to get away with it under the guise of calling it the Mine Operator's home, but you need permission from the forestry Service to build it. And that isn't likely to happen, due to the huge amount of fraud associated with this program. And they DO check. Last year alone, they discovered, in a random check of claims, that of the 240 they looked at, 239 were fraudulent. They also prosecute.³ You don't have to mine the land, but why pay money for land you can't use? While you might be able to hunt and fish it, most of the land falls under the holdings of the National Forest Service and these activities fall under their jurisdiction. And you can't build a hunting cabin or anything like that, so why bother?⁴ The land is available for sale from the government, but you must make a "significant" mineral discovery on it to gain a patent.
